1 EXHIBIT Andy Coolquitt gives you the finger

Andy Coolquitt is one of the art world's favorite rabble-rousers, perhaps best known for his always-morphing "living studio" that kept him from graduating from the University of Texas. His work is primarily made from objects he finds on the street, which he then turns into leaning, sometimes functioning sculptures, like the assemblages made of working lightbulbs in his last appearance at Lisa Cooley. His sophomore show, "We Care About You," doesn't shy away from his usual brand of brazen humor: It includes several small sculptures of hands giving the finger—meant to illustrate the "exchange of energy that happens between humans"—but you can take that however you want.
